Silver Sphere says, “I wrote the chorus of football game when I was in high school. At the time, it was about exploring sex and love for the first time, and the feeling of nativity that comes with that. But it’s also about the double standard of exploring sexuality for young men and women, and how often girls are shamed for the very experiences boys are praised and idolized for. When I got in the studio with Dylan, I took the choruses, which depict how slut shaming can make girls feel weak, and I rewrote verses around it that reflect the more powerful side of feminem sexuality and the confidence I grew into as I got older.

I’ve loved working with Dylan for years and have been mesmerized by the intense sound of his production. I knew that this song needed his uniqueness and unapologetic power to accompany the concept.”

21-year-old Silver Sphere has garnered over 13M Spotify streams worldwide and released her yikes! EP last fall which featured her track “boys r dumb! duh!”. Last fall, she also supported Omar Apollo on his North American tour.
