ABOUT ZOE WEES:

Breakout star Zoe Wees has a knack for making her complex, emotional stories feel universally relatable. On “Control,” her raw, powerful debut single, she confronted the emotional scars that resulted from her childhood struggle with benign rolandic epilepsy, a traumatic, isolating condition that can cause severe seizures. She soon found that the song struck a chord with other people who were dealing both with similar and with completely different problems. “Control” became a worldwide hit, entered the top 20 at Pop radio in the U.S. and led to her U.S. television debut on “The Late Late Show with James Corden.”

“Girls Like Us,” Wees’ follow-up single, was praised by People as “a vulnerable pop anthem that pushed for togetherness and solidarity to girls around the world.” She performed the track on “Jimmy Kimmel Live!” Combined, the two songs have amassed over 800 million global streams. The nineteen-year-old was Apple Music’s Up Next artist for April 2021. She released her debut EP, Golden Wings, in May via Capitol Records.
